SATURDAY, JULY 9.

ADDRESS,

DELIVERED BY DR. W. A. DANGER-FIELD, AT THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH, ON THE
FOURTH OF JULY, 1803.

(Concluded.)

Associates and Fellow-Citizens,

I could with the limits of this oration, and adequate capacity, would permit me to notice more particularly the character of such American worthies as have preeminently distinguished themselves by their virtues and talents; either as writers, statesmen, or heroes in conceiving, planning, or accomplishing the glorious conquest of our independence.
But though I am precluded from doing so relative to others, yet there is the character of one, elevated far above the rest by the conspicuous part he acted during and since our revolution, the comprehensive greatness of which I cannot possibly pass by in silence.

Called upon, as a member of the Washington Society, to deliver, on this day, an appropriate oration—what I have to offer in obedience to such call should be appropriate not only to the day itself, but also to the peculiar connection with it, in which our society is placed by its constitution. The links of adamant which peculiarly and inseparably connects us with the fourth of July is the character of the late illustrious GEORGE WASHINGTON, to commemorate whose virtues and talents, and to promote whose charities, are the important objects of our association—I must, therefore, fellow citizens, feel myself impressed with a most lively sense of the difficulty in which I am involved by this circumstance. It requires of me, and without the smallest pretension to adequate capacity on my part, to speak the appropriate praise of our country's nay, the world's great benefactor—the eulogy of the immortal WASHINGTON is the arduous task it imposes—a task, the difficult execution of which is proven by the fact, that when his transcendent merits have been the theme of praise, the talents of few, very few eulogists have risen to the exalted level of the occasion—mine, more humble than ordinary, must fall far below it.

But such is the pure, unmixed, and, if I may be indulged in the expression, fier-ling worth of that great man's character, as strongly to impress me with a belief, that its best eulogy will ever be found in the simple, yet impartial and dignified pages of competent historians and biographers—whose statements of facts relative to his virtues and talents shall not be clouded, obscured, nor involved in suspecting doubt by the pomp, parade, or splendid exaggerations of the language of fury or fiction, whether expressed in poetry or poetic prose. I shall content myself, therefore, with stating, merely for the purpose of drawing a few inferences from them, certain facts relative to that conduct in military, political, and civil life, which has so justly procured him the admiration, esteem and love of all good and unprejudiced people in his own and every country, where there is sympathy for virtue and talents, and will transmit his character to future ages as a correct model of imitation for the truly patriotic hero, statesman, or citizen.

To Congress, deliberating on the important subject of appointing an appropriate Commander in Chief to their beloved country, fighting under the banners of liberty, WASHINGTON, the destined saviour of his country, stood forth demonstrated by the singular virtue and inflexi-ble firmness of his general character; by the heroic bravery, and great military enterprise he had evinced, whilst in the service of the mother country, whose ungrateful tyranny was now to be repelled, as the man pre-eminently worthy of a trust of such high and awful responsibility.— Congress, therefore, gave, and he, with modest diffidence accepted, supreme command.

How far the talents he displayed in that elevated, but most difficult and trying station, justified the choice of their country and the world, let the rapid growth of discipline amongst his new raised troops; their great and efficient energies excited by the implicit confidence in his character; the caution never to be surprised, the perseverance never to be fatigated, with which he conducted those energies to victory—let that uniform magnanimity of soul, which viewed disaster and success with the same composure of countenance, disarmed, by the hope and courage it inspired, calamity of a great share of its destructive influence, and gave him command in the hearts and affections of his officers and soldiers.—et the more than Fabian talent displayed on the banks of the Delaware and at Trenton—in a word, let the independence and freedom they conquered for his country say, and speak his praise. This is the praise of military talents—WASHINGTON had also military virtues. Let then the eulogy justly due those rare and exemplary virtues, which so highly graced his talents as a general, be pronounced by my recalling to your memory that fascinating model, the never failing test of virtuous worth, with which he accepted the sacred trust of commander in chief, that nobly generous and unexampled disinterestedness of motive with which he served his country—but above all, that exalted greatness of soul, which, in correct sympathy with true glory, soared above the temptations of ambition, and confounded the wicked designs of party, at the awful and critical period, when, under circumstances acutely painful to the lively feelings of every patriot, it was necessary to disband the brave defenders of their country's rights.

The independence of America was accomplished, WASHINGTON was no longer a general—his transcendent military talents had surmounted all difficulties and commanded victory; but the immortal virtues of the patriot pronounced that victory to have been achieved for his country and not himself.

Where the views of men are not jaun-diced, nor their judgments perverted by the malignant influence of party spirit, magnanimous virtue like this must ever command its just tribute of reverential respect. Grateful, therefore, indeed, has it been to my feelings, whilst in a foreign country, to hear eulogies on the splendid achievements of the most accomplished usurper of modern times, then in the full blaze of their tinsel brilliancy, and their short lived lustre untarnished by time, qualified by this memorable expression, “but he is no WASHINGTON.” It was in a like manner grateful to my feelings, to hear it said of a truly great character, who, with unrivalled ability fought and conquered for his country; but then retired to improve and enjoy with the rest of his fellow citizens, the blessings of society, “that he was the WASHINGTON of France.” Having accomplished the emancipation of his country, and his vir-tuous ambition fully gratified by the event, the Cincinnatus of America would, in obedience to the impulses of his peaceful nature, have spent the remainder of his days in the cultivation and enjoyment of social blessings, now fully protected by the shield of his own greatness against unjust foreign interference.

But his country, though independent of foreign power, was not independent of the injurious influence of jarring local interests, and distracting views of party. A short course of experience had fully proven, that though the old confederation, formed for a temporary purpose only, had conducted us safe through the revolution; because supported by what was almost the vital principle of its authority, our common dangers and fears, yet it was then no longer adequate to the maintenance of union, and that designing men were disposed to take advantage of its feebleness, to foment dissensions amongst the people and effect a separation of the states. It remained to be proven by the measures of virtuous and enlightened patriotism, whether independence, her proud boast, and in the conquest and establishment of which she had so recently suffered every calamity and braved every danger, was to cause the happiness or misery of our country, whether it was to be its blessing or curse. The evil was great and urgent, the remedy required prompt and radical—that which seemed indicated by the valuable results of experience, was a government formed upon a liberal representative scale, and thereby possessed of powers adequate to harmonize jarring local interests as much as possible, conciliate parties, support federal union, and protect and secure rights and liberties, recently defended and maintained in consideration of their great importance, at the expence of much blood and treasure.

To effect this momentous purpose, and with requisite promptitude, whose influence so important, whose co-operation so essential as his, who harmonized, conciliated and united every description of his fellow citizens in one common sentiment of admiration, esteem and love of his character. WASHINGTON, therefore, rising superior to the Roman patriot and hero, left retirement and presided in that august assembly of enlightened and just influential statesmen, the fruit of whose labours is the constitution of government, under which we now live a free, prosperous and happy people. A representative free and efficient government formed for our happy country, and ready to be submitted to the test of a patient and fair course of experience, who was there so completely qualified to preside over its administration in that truly interesting state of infancy and insipient experiment, WASHINGTON was, by the unanimous suffrage of his countrymen, elected president; his administration of the newly formed government of his country furnished a luminous commentary on the virtue of his motives as late commander in chief of her armies. The complete protection and security our liberties enjoyed under his government, the revival of political harmony, the rapid increase of public credit, industry of every species and wealth, the promising, though infant growth of arts and sciences, and the general morality and happiness of the people furnished the most satisfactory evidence, that the objects for which he had fought and conquered were rational liberty and the well protected blessings of good society. In the latter most difficult and trying period of his administration, when his increasing love of retirement, in consideration of threatening dangers, had again given place to the paramount love of country, the maintenance of social order and tranquility at home, and the relations of peace and amity abroad—as far as the spirit of foreign politics, and the designs of party, both at home and abroad, incessantly tending to involve us in the distracting vortex of their influence, would possibly permit, unequivocally proved his transcendent and peculiar talents as a politician to protect and even cultivate and improve in the face of all the most adverse circumstances, the blessings he had so virtuously fought for and gloriously obtained.—The experiment patiently and fairly made—our government proven adequate to the protection of liberty and the blessings of society, even in the worst of times, the twice saviour of his country announced by his valedictory address, that valuable legacy of correct political principles, his intention of retiring to the enjoyment of those tranquil blessings of social intercourse, with which the republican virtue and simplicity of his nature even sympathized, and the constant enjoyment of which nothing had induced him to forego but the good of his country. But though he had long, and with transcendent virtue and ability, served her in the important characters of General and Statesman, yet such was the variety and extent of his capacity to do good, such the force of his propensity to exert it, that he was now only changing the sphere of his utility.

For in retirement, still consistent with that character, of which the calculations of sordid self made no part, he unrenittingly continued to advance the improvement of his country—he was the friend of learning, arts, sciences, and all the efficient means of ameliorating the condition of man destined for society and happiness; some of those means he cultivated and improved himself, others he promoted by his patronage—with all he had the lively sympathies of an ardent friend—his character as a retired citizen most beautifully illustrated those of the General and Statesman—its features obviously proved, that he fought for rational liberty, that he government for her protection and security, firmly convinced by his knowledge of the

There is one of the virtues of WASH-which I must notice a little more particu-

...promptitude, whose influence is important, whose co-operation is as his, who harmonized, conciliated every description of citizens in one common sentiment of esteem and love of his country. WASHINGTON, therefore, rising to the Roman patriot and hero, and presided in that assembly of enlightened and just statesmen, the fruit of whose constitution of government, which we now live a free, prosperous people. A representative government formed for country, and ready to be subjected to a patient and fair experience, who was there to qualify to preside over its administration in that truly interesting and insipid experiment. WASHINGTON was, by the unanimous countrymen, elected president of his country, and his administration of the newly formed government of his country furnished a commentary on the virtues of a late commander in chief. The complete protection of our liberties enjoyed under the revival of political life, the rapid increase of public credit, the growth of every species and wealth, the infant growth of sciences, and the general moral happiness of the people furnished satisfactory evidence, that the which he had fought and conquered for liberty and the well blessings of good society. In the most difficult and trying period of his administration, when his increasing dangers, had again given place to the love of country, the of social order and tranquility, and the relations of peace abroad—as far as the spirit of peace, and the designs of party, and abroad, incessantly involve us in the distracting influence, would possibly have proved his transcendent talents as a politician and even cultivate and improve all the most adverse circumstances he had so virtuously and gloriously obtained. The and fairly made—the proven adequate to the liberty and the blessings of in the worst of times, the of his country announced a political address, that valuable and correct political principles, his to the enjoyment of the blessings of social inter- which the republican virtue of his nature even sympathized with the constant enjoyment of his country. But though with transcendent virtue served her in the important General and Statesman, yet variety and extent of his character, such the force of his exert it, that he was now the sphere of his utility, still consistent with of which the calculations made no part, he unremittingly to advance the improvement of his country—he was the friend of sciences, and all the efficiency of the condition of our society and happiness; means he cultivated and others he promoted by with all he had the lively and ardent friend—his character most beautifully of the General and Statesman obviously proved, that protection and security, and by his knowledge of the of man, and the constitution, that it must be the influence of her reign and society in an exalted state will unfold those great as in reserve for her free, and energetic mem-

...peculiarly interesting, his decided attachment to representative government and liberty. His correct mind was duly impressed with the basis of genuine republicanism—that for representative government, to answer best its purpose, the protection of liberty, the elective franchise should be maintained in a state of requisite purity, and that purity depends on public opinion being duly instructed and informed—hence his lively sympathies with that important object—hence his liberal donations for the truly patriotic purpose of its accomplishment. This comprehensive greatness of character, thus rounded off and completed, thus shaped in the most harmonious agreement with the true standard of varied excellence, must, until man shall change his nature, and by a perversion of his sympathies cease to admire transcendent virtue and talents, enshrine the immortal WASHINGTON in the grateful remembrance of his species, and cause him still to live in the essential benefits they will and must derive from imitating so perfect a model of the virtuously and wisely patriotic hero, statesman and citizen.

Yet this sacred character, though rendered invulnerable by the shield of its own purity, has been attacked, and WASHINGTON called traitor and comploter against the representative government and liberty of his country—but, happily for its immortal glory, the blow was levelled by party spirit: yes, by that very party spirit, the existence of which he denounced, and its evil consequences predicted with prophetic truth, in his valedictory address, the political opinions of which evinced his mind to have been richly stored with the most valuable results of experience, relative to the governing motives and ruling passions of designing and ambitious men. Party spirit, at that period, of vigorous growth, and a composition of all the disocial passions, uniting in its own existence, and in a state of refined and concentrated malignity, the peculiar properties of each, had its objects of ambitious pursuit—impediments in its way were next to be removed. Under such circumstances, what character more precisely suited to its attack, than patriotic WASHINGTON'S? What instruments more worthy of its use, than those unnatural combinations of exquisite vice and talents, of which too many splendid specimens have of late years been exhibited amongst us, abusing the patient liberty of our country. But though such finished models of refined depravity, possessed of every motive to do harm, by the essential malevolence of their nature, supplied with all the requisite modes of action by the most appropriate talents, may cause incalculable mischief for a time, yet, happily for humanity, and in spite of the steady malignity of their propensities, they ultimately promote the cause of virtue. They form such disgusting and odious contrasts with characters like WASHINGTON'S, that at length they free the prejudiced and deluded of their error and infatuation, and waken them to a just sense of their dangers; when, astonished at past errors, frightened by impending ruin, they fly from the calamity of vice and folly to the protecting shield of virtue and wisdom, and thus instructed by the scourge of painful experience, become the firm friends of rational freedom and good society. Party spirit, in all countries, must be an evil, in republics it is their greatest curse—but for its disastrous influence the sincere attachment for representative government and freedom, transferred from America to France, there, like the pebble in the lake, might, before this, have covered the bosom of Europe with the calmly succeeding waves of rational liberty. But for the same disastrous influence, our own country, though still prosperous and happy, might, at the present day, have exhibited to the world an example of national prosperity and happiness unheard of before in ancient or modern times. The evil, therefore, fellow citizens, may become most calamitously destructive in its consequences: it should be deemed the sacred duty of every true patriot to oppose its growth, which though now, perhaps, limited by restraining virtue and wisdom, may yet, unless unremittingly watched, swell into gigantic stature, and revive in our ill fated country the horrors of revolutionary France.

—When we shall remain drenched in blood, and oppressed with every other species of calamity, by the despotism of contending and succeeding parties, until some jacobinical general, mightier than the rest, shall, in the transcendent superiority of his influence, envelope all opposition, rise triumphant on the ruins of all parties, and for the gratification of his ambition, restore us to a state of tranquillity and calm; but the tranquillity and calm of deep rooted and permanent despotism. Its calamitous influence, even now, is truly alarming, and calls with an impetuous voice on every feeling patriot to co-operate in the application of appropriate remedies: for such remedies let us consult the oracular opinions of the departed favour of our country, and through their salutary advice save her again from impending ruin. They will tell us to promote the instruction of youth—a remedy the application of which is patriotically began and so forcibly recommended by his own illustrious example—they will tell us to correct and inform public opinion, through every possible fair medium: not by opposing and combating misrepresentation by misrepresentation—falsehood by falsehood—but by opposing truth to error; not speculative truth, but the well established and valuable results of sober experience. Tho' the contest, thus conducted, should be long and tedious, owing to the adverse circumstances under which truth may have to contend, yet the victory will be certain and decisive—the elective franchise will be maintained in its purity, and our country governed by virtue and talents.

In this glorious conflict between truth and falsehood, the heroes worthy of composing the army of the former, should be such virtuous and enlightened citizens, as are competent to draw the proper line of distinction between the true purposes and benefits of government and those of society; who nobly discarded the ignominious idea of regarding the former as a mere caterer for the appetites of avarice and ambition—a mere broker of places—but justly conceive it answers but its legitimate and dignified purposes, when by affording a complete protection to individuals in society, it enables useful citizens to cultivate and improve social blessings, and thereby add to the common stock, from which all derive their true happiness. In what I have just said, I by no means wish to be understood, as intending any thing disrespectful to those, who by the application of their talents and time to the conscientious discharge of the duties of public offices, are justly entitled to a liberal remuneration for their valuable services—I only meant to characterize that fierce animosity and hatred between parties, the soul of which is too often contending views of avarice and ambition.

Thus, associates and fellow citizens, have I humbly attempted, in the discharge of my duty, to trace the links of necessary connection, between liberty and happiness, representative government and liberty—thus have I, more humbly still, endeavored to show that the illustrious patriot, whose name so highly honors our society, fought, conquered, governed and discharged the duties of a good citizen, for the establishment, protection and advancement of those sacred truths and their inestimable blessings.—That I have not fulfilled my duty, I perfectly know, but that I earnestly endeavored to do so I have the most lively consciousness.

Extract of a letter from New York, dated the 5th July.

“Arrived, the ships Messenger, Moncrieff, in 40 days from Barcelona; Factor, Caldwell, from Greenock, 44 days; and several from the West Indies.

An Antigua paper mentions three captures of American vessels that had French troops on board.

A letter from our correspondent at Halifax, dated the 21st ult. mentions the arrival there of the British sloop of war, Driver, capt. Fame, in a very short passage from England, with dispatches from Admiral Sir Andrew Mitchell.—She sailed the 23d of May, and brought out the news of war.

The same letter mentions the arrival of the ship John, capt. Irvin, in 45 days from Gibraltar. The Duke of Kent sailed from Gibraltar, for England the 3d day of May. It also announces the sailing from Halifax of the Lady Hobart packet, capt. Fellows, for Falmouth. Col. Cook, of the guards, went out in her.”
